Dear Friends,

For many, last year's elections demonstrated the power of a new 21st century connectedness, linking diverse voices from all corners of the country to ensure that those long excluded from centers of power would finally have a say.

Creating connections for powerful, inclusive change is at the heart of the Ms. Foundation for Women's approach. It has long been our practice to support the efforts of low-income women and women of color to reach decision-making tables at all levels. Today, as our country tackles a host of urgent issues, their leadership is more vital than ever.

In fact, our 2007-2008 grantees illustrate the critical difference women who are most marginalized by race and class make in changing policy and our broader culture.

In rural South Texas, for example, migrant women farmworkers knew that access to transportation was key to their reproductive health. If women couldn't get to a clinic, what did it matter if it existed at all? So, they organized, created La Voz Latina (Voice of Latinas, a project of Migrant Health Promotion) with Ms. Foundation support, and advocated before local officials to secure funds for regular, affordable bus service that would put their isolated communities on the map. Today, thanks to training from the National Latina Institute for Reproductive Health (NLIRH), a sister grantee with whom they connected at a Ms. Foundation gathering, they're now learning to navigate the Texas Legislature and to promote policies that address the priorities of immigrant and low-income women across the entire state.

CREATING CONNECTIONS: STRATEGIES FOR STRONGER MOVEMENTS

Each year, in addition to delivering over $4 million in grantmaking, the Ms. Foundation brings together grassroots and national groups like La Voz Latina and NLIRH to learn from and network with one another, to strategize, and ultimately, to build and strengthen powerful social movements.

At the Ms. Foundation, we believe that cultivating these kinds of connections is essential to strengthening our democracy and bringing about the just and safe world we strive to create.

That's why in 2008, we launched a new framework for our philanthropy, Creating Connections: Strategies for Stronger Movements. The Ms. Foundation has always linked activists and donors, and recognized the connections among the myriad issues women face in their daily lives. But today, we are supporting new and deeper connections—across race, class and gender, and across issues, constituencies and policymaking levels—to build greater power to ignite inclusive, equitable change.

Indeed, the complexity of the challenges before us—from economic insecurity to broken health care, criminal justice and immigration systems—necessitates a creative, strategic approach.

Across the country, our grantees create connections for more just solutions every day. For example, the Alabama Women's Resource Network knows that women's incarceration is directly connected to poverty, domestic violence and substance abuse. With support from the Ms. Foundation, they’re building power by connecting incarcerated women, social service providers, abuse counselors and advocates, reducing the number of women in prison in Alabama and creating a broader base of support for healthier, community-based alternatives to incarceration.

MAKING THIS MOMENT COUNT

Without doubt, the 2008 elections created a tremendous opportunity for progressive policy and culture change and new engagement with the grassroots. In fact, during the transition to Barack Obama’s presidency, the National Women’s Health Network (a founding member of Raising Women’s Voices), Wider Opportunities for Women, WORLD (Women Organized to Respond to Life-Threatening Disease) and several other grantees were invited to share their ideas with the new administration—on issues from health care reform and green jobs to HIV/AIDS. A year ago, it was hard to believe this would have been the case. What a cause for celebration!

Today, however, we face a renewed backlash, a reminder that we must relentlessly forge connections of all kinds to ensure a powerful base capable of holding policymakers accountable and ushering in true progressive change. Most importantly, we must make sure that the voices of women organizers are heard. As new policies are introduced and battles are fought, their wisdom will be crucial.

Moving forward, the Ms. Foundation will continue to elevate grassroots women’s voices and connect them to federal policymaking tables so that they’re an even greater force to be reckoned with on a national scale.

For nearly four decades, the Ms. Foundation has seeded and strengthened movements and supported cutting-edge, grassroots women’s organizing at important moments in our nation’s history. Drawing on this legacy, we will meet the challenges and opportunities ahead.

And, as careful students of history, we know how important it is to take stock of victories along the way. Today, we continue to bask in the groundbreaking glow of our first African American President and our first Latina Supreme Court Justice!

With you by our side, we know we will celebrate new victories ahead. Together, we will make every moment count.

We see the path. The more we create connections for the common good, the more successful—and wiser—we’ll all be. The more we lift women’s voices, the more collective power we’ll have to realize our vision of a just and safe world and an equitable and inclusive democracy in our country.

BUILDING POWER, BUILDING VOICE: MIGRANT WOMEN FARMWORKERS TAKE THE LEAD

Graciela Camarena worked as a migrant farmworker before becoming a promotora de salud for Migrant Health Promotion and now associate director. APRIL 2008

In South Texas, just miles from the U.S.-Mexico border, colonias, unincorporated communities that lack basic services like electricity, sewage, potable water or paved roads, dot the landscape. Immigrants—women and men—in search of work in onion or citrus fields, settle here, often with their families. In fact, 97 percent of women farmworkers are accompanied by their children. But while striving to improve their lives, migrant workers face innumerable barriers to economic security and good health—from lack of health insurance to poverty wages and fear of deportation.

“We work in rural areas where women are afraid to come out,” says Lucy Félix, program coordinator of La Voz Latina. In 2001, with crucial seed money from the Ms. Foundation for Women, migrant women—who bear the brunt of poor health in their communities—and local health workers, or promotoras, founded La Voz Latina (Voice of Latinas), a project of Migrant Health Promotion (MHP). Using grassroots organizing and popular education, they would build the leadership and power of migrant women farmworkers to advocate for their reproductive rights and access to reproductive health care. “We knock on their doors and invite them to community meetings. We make them feel important and that their voice should be heard,” says Lucy, herself the daughter of a farmworker.

CONNECTING ISSUES FOR JUSTICE

La Voz Latina (LVL) knew that they would have to fight many battles to ensure women’s access to reproductive care. But early on, they identified a lack of public transportation as the primary barrier. Even if health services existed, what did it matter if a woman couldn’t reach them?

So LVL organized to connect women to the few clinics that do operate along the U.S.-Mexico border. They mobilized women they’d spent years developing relationships with in the colonias, organized a rally which drew the attention of local media, and met with representatives of the local transportation authority, Rio Transit, to press their case. It turned out that their colonias were so remote and neglected that they weren’t on any of Rio Transit’s regional maps. But that would soon change.

“It was a dream come true, to be in the offices of Congresspersons speaking about the importance of women’s reproductive health.”

In 2007, as a result of LVL’s tireless advocacy, Rio Transit began offering regular bus service to five colonias. But LVL didn’t stop there. Each year, they lobby for the expansion of service. Today, partnering with the Brownsville Urban Transportation System as well, they’ve secured public transportation for nine colonias, connecting thousands of women to reproductive and primary care.

LVL credits the Ms. Foundation with its long-term support for their advocacy, based on the Foundation’s belief that linking issues is a powerful strategy for change. According to Lucy Félix, the Ms. Foundation, unlike many other funders, “sees that transportation is a women’s issue and a social justice issue.”

BUILDING LEADERSHIP, BUILDING POWER

LVL came to address transportation to promote women’s health because they build women’s leadership to advance solutions rooted in their experience along the U.S.-Mexico border. Day after day, LVL connects women to resources and to one another, building their collective power to ignite change—from the local transportation authority to the U.S. Congress—that will make a difference in their own lives.

To date, LVL has trained over 100 active community leaders. Following the promotora model, which contends that community members are best positioned to promote community health, LVL trains local women to conduct organizing and outreach in their own communities, building trusted leaders who promote LVL’s work. Community leaders help LVL staff reach over 1,000 women directly each year.

In October 2007, one such community leader, Elva Mireles, joined LVL staff members Lucy Félix and Maria Treviño on a lobbying expedition to Washington, DC organized by another Ms. Foundation grantee, the National Latina Institute for Reproductive Health (NLIRH). LVL and NLIRH visited Texas legislators to advocate for immigration reform and increased funding for reproductive health services and education. One of LVL’s primary goals is to restore cuts to reproductive health care made by the Texas Legislature in 2007.

The Ms. Foundation introduced LVL to NLIRH at a grantee gathering. Since then, they’ve developed a lasting relationship that strengthens both organizations: NLIRH shares its national expertise with LVL and colonia residents through advocacy trainings and other opportunities while NLIRH’s deepens its understanding of migrant women farmworkers’ priorities and brings their perspectives to organizing nationwide.

After her visit to Washington, Elva remarked proudly: “I never in my dreams imagined myself in the Capitol, speaking with political authorities. It was a dream come true, to be in the offices of Congresspersons speaking about the importance of women’s reproductive health, to be the spokesperson for women who live in the Valley.”

POLICY CHANGE FOR SYSTEMS CHANGE

LVL builds women’s collective power to change policies; this is how they know they’ll tackle the root causes of the injustices migrant women face. “We all know that policy change is where systems change takes place,” says Gayle Lawn-Day, executive director of MHP. Changing a system that perpetuates poverty and poor health is not easy, of course. But whether knocking on the doors of family homes or federal offices, LVL is creating a force for change that is bringing hundreds of women out of isolation to advance policies intended to ensure their full access to reproductive rights, health and justice.

DOMESTIC WORKERS, GLOBAL IMPACT: DOMESTIC WORKERS UNITED CAMPAIGNS FOR RIGHTS

Domestic workers march to the United Nations in New York City to bring international attention to human rights abuses in the homes of UN diplomats. OCTOBER 2008

“We work in an industry where people are being treated like slaves,” Lois Newland, a nanny working in New York and originally from Jamaica, told Women’s eNews. “We’re not shackled, but we have to work long hours, and have employees working eight, nine years then discarded, and terminated without any compensation.”

As far back as slavery, in fact, and continuing today, domestic workers like Lois have been excluded from state and federal labor protections afforded to nearly every other worker. At the whim of individual employers who aren’t required to provide a living wage, basic benefits or to treat their employees fairly, domestic workers—primarily immigrant women of color—face widespread abuse and exploitation. In fact, multiple examples, from being forced to sleep in a basement with sewage overflow, to having one’s passport stolen and forced to work without pay, outline nothing less than a human rights crisis.

Thanks to the advocacy of Domestic Workers United (DWU), however, a New York City-based grassroots organization led by over 2,300 nannies, housekeepers and elderly caregivers, the law may soon be on domestic workers’ side—not just in New York, but across the U.S.

SETTING A PRECEDENT FOR JUSTICE NATIONWIDE

Since they set up shop in a small office in the Bronx, DWU has grown quickly. With critical support from the Ms. Foundation for Women throughout its development, DWU has become a strong, sustainable organization capable of galvanizing a movement and bringing New York State to the brink of unprecedented change.

In 2003, DWU persuaded the New York City Council to pass the first bill in the country to expand domestic workers’ labor protections. Next, they moved quickly to write and lobby for state legislation, the Domestic Workers Bill of Rights, which would guarantee basic labor standards including a living wage, overtime, paid vacation and sick days, and health care coverage for the roughly 200,000 domestic workers across New York State.

“We work in an industry where people are being treated like slaves,” Lois Newland, a nanny working in New York and originally from Jamaica, told Women’s eNews. “We’re not shackled, but we have to work long hours, and have employees working eight, nine years then discarded, and terminated without any compensation.”

Today, in 2009, DWU is closer to victory than ever before. Key protections outlined in the Bill of Rights have been passed by the New York State Assembly, and a more comprehensive version, including paid sick days, awaits passage by the Senate. In June 2009, New York Governor David Paterson publicly stated that if the Bill of Rights reached his desk, he’d sign it into law.

If passed, the Domestic Workers Bill of Rights would set a national precedent and encourage other states to follow suit. Domestic worker organizations across the U.S. are already using the bill as a model in their states, hoping to extend labor protections to the estimated 2 million domestic workers nationwide.

A WINNING STRATEGY

From its beginning, DWU knew that they’d need to develop relationships with labor, immigrants’ rights and other groups across the social justice spectrum. To win, they’d need to encourage others to see domestic workers’ struggle as their own.

And “winning” would mean more than one policy. Ultimately, they’d create lasting connections across issues, organizations and constituencies to build a more inclusive progressive movement in which immigrant women of color would play a leadership role. Together, they’d have more power to create equitable, sustainable change for all workers and hold policymakers accountable over the long haul.

Ai-Jen Poo, lead organizer of DWU, is grateful to those who have helped echo domestic workers’ urgent call. “Thanks in part to joint visits by domestic workers and our allies to the state capital, there is not a legislator left who is unfamiliar with the lack of legal protections for domestic workers.”

Today, the Domestic Workers Bill of Rights has over 80 organizational co-sponsors, including key players in the labor movement. In 2008, AFL-CIO President John Sweeney accompanied DWU members to testify before state lawmakers in favor of the bill, sending a powerful message on behalf of 10 million AFL-CIO members nationwide.

Meanwhile domestic workers are strengthening the broader progressive landscape, drawing on experiences at the crossroads of gender, race, class and immigration to promote just solutions that improve everyone’s lives.

“What we see—and what others are beginning to see—is that being a woman, an immigrant, and a low-wage worker in an unprotected industry is incredibly powerful,” says Ai-Jen. “When you experience so many aspects of inequality, you’re in a really strong position to imagine something different, something better, a better future that doesn’t leave anybody behind.”

BUILDING POWER FOR A BETTER FUTURE

DWU is truly determined to imagine a future—and a movement—that leaves no one behind. In 2007, with support from the Ms. Foundation, DWU members joined the U.S. Social Forum, a national gathering of social justice activists. There they connected with other domestic worker advocates to form the National Domestic Workers Alliance, a coalition of 19 groups from 10 cities. In 2008, DWU hosted the first-ever National Domestic Workers Congress. Today the National Alliance is crafting recommendations to send to U.S. Secretary of Labor Hilda Solis and connecting with domestic workers around the world to ensure they have a seat at the International Labor Organization.

In less than a decade, DWU has gone from a fledgling organization to the author of championed, historic state legislation and a leader in a national and global movement. A movement led by and for a growing tide of women laborers who are coming out of the shadows, no longer isolated in their homes, no longer afraid to fight for their rights. Building the power and visibility of immigrant women of color workers at decision-making tables worldwide, DWU is sparking groundbreaking change that will benefit generations to come.

BREAKING GROUND ON THE GULF COAST: CREATING CONNECTIONS TO WIDEN OPPORTUNITIES FOR WOMEN IN CONSTRUCTION

Sabrina Graley, a graduate of the Women in Construction training program, works on her first job in Bay St. Louis, Mississippi. DECEMBER 2008

Long before the country as a whole was turning to “shovel-ready” jobs to stimulate economic recovery, people on the Gulf Coast were looking to construction and related trades to boost employment and rebuild communities after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita. But across the country, women had faced discrimination and other barriers to these fields for years. So how would women in Mississippi and Louisiana, especially low-income women and women of color who were in greatest need of living-wage jobs, benefit from a construction boom?

With women representing less than three percent of workers in building trades nationwide, the answer certainly wouldn't be easy. But soon after the storms hit in 2005, the Ms. Foundation for Women began funding long-time grantee Wider Opportunities for Women (WOW), a national organization based in Washington, DC with expertise in promoting women's access to building trades, to lay the groundwork for a solution.

From decades of experience, WOW knew that with the right skills and support, women could help rebuild communities—and their own lives. Indeed, higher wages offered in construction and related trades were in high demand after the hurricanes decimated tourism and other industries that typically employ women, and with single women-led families in Mississippi earning an average yearly income of $16,547.

CONNECTING NATIONAL EXPERIENCE TO GRASSROOTS EXPERTISE

Understanding the importance of rooting a solution in community wisdom, WOW set out to link their national experience to grassroots expertise on the Gulf Coast. They found a perfect partner in Moore Community House (MCH), a community-development organization in Biloxi, Mississippi which worked closely with low-income women and women of color and had a deep understanding of the challenges they faced.

“Wider Opportunities for Women knew that with the right skills and support, women could help rebuild communities—and their own lives.”

WOW suggested that, together, they design a program that would equip women with construction skills and offer critical resources to build and sustain women’s economic security over the long haul. MCH was quickly on board; they assessed local interest among women and contractors alike—in fact, it turned out that demand significantly outpaced the number of available skilled workers throughout the region.

BREAKING NEW GROUND

In 2008, after conducting research and an initial pilot phase with critical support from WOW, MCH launched Women in Construction (WINC), the first construction training program for women on the Gulf Coast.

In WINC’s first year, 50 women graduated with entry-level skills. Women like Sabrina Graley, a mother of two and graduate of WINC’s second class, who found a job with a commercial contracting company as a carpenter’s helper and helped rebuild an historic church in Bay St. Louis, MS.

Today, WINC has the capacity to train 60-80 women, and a waiting list of 265 women. Despite its small size, it has received recognition from state and national officials. The U.S. Department of Labor now lists WINC as a source for federal contractors looking to hire women and people of color, and after learning of the project upon a visit by WOW and MCH to Washington, DC, a Mississippi Congressperson was so impressed that he began supporting a line item for it.

CONNECTING CRITICAL ISSUES IN WOMEN’S LIVES

WINC has succeeded not only because it teaches women to operate heavy machinery, but also because it makes connections among the multiple barriers women face in securing and sustaining jobs in “non-traditional” fields. WINC links physical infrastructure to social infrastructure, offering mentoring and other resources, in addition to skills-building, that help women succeed.

WOW and MCH knew, for instance, that a lack of public transportation and quality, affordable child care, coupled with pervasive bias against women in the construction industry, would make it extremely difficult for women, especially low-income single mothers to find and keep a job. So they offered financial stipends for transportation and child care and equipped women with job placement assistance and tools to defend themselves against hostility and harassment. They also began working with employers to improve their treatment of women in the workplace and uphold anti-discrimination laws.

CONSTRUCTING A LIVABLE, EQUITABLE FUTURE

Ultimately, the goal of WINC’s founding partners is to change policies and culture so that all women are welcome and respected on construction sites and have fair access to living wages in up-and-coming industries like green jobs—on the Gulf Coast and nationwide.

“We need to show that there are plenty of women out there who, with appropriate resources directed to job training and outreach, are shovel-ready just like the jobs themselves,” says Joan Kuriansky, executive director of WOW. The achievements of WINC and similar programs go a long way towards dispelling the myth that women can’t lay pipes or roads alongside men, and can be a model to ensure women’s access to new and emerging opportunities in physical infrastructure across the U.S.

Back in Mississippi, as recovery from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita continues, WINC graduates are doing their part to shift cultural expectations in the home, community and workplace to make it easier for the next generation of women builders. When they envision a more livable, equitable future, many have their own children in mind: at just one-year-old, the daughter of WINC student Kaya Blaylock can be seen playing comfortably with a toy hammer and saw in hand.

GIVING TO THE MS. FOUNDATION FOR WOMEN

The Ms. Foundation for Women supports thousands of women leaders and their organizations in diverse urban and rural areas across the United States. We are uniquely positioned to link local, regional and national work and leaders for the greatest impact.

Please help us to bring the experience and solutions of women and girls to create policy and culture change. The Ms. Foundation offers many opportunities to get involved in our work:

- Make an unrestricted gift and increase the Ms. Foundation's ability to respond quickly to problems and opportunities with flexible, proactive grantmaking.
- Attend our annual event, The Gloria Awards: A National Salute to Women of Vision.
- Join Gloria Steinem and others by creating a bequest or trust naming the Ms. Foundation as a beneficiary of your estate and become a member of our Endless Wave Legacy Group.
- Join our Democracy Funding Circle.
- Make a gift in honor or in memory of a family member, friend, partner or someone you admire. We will notify the person or family and friends of your thoughtfulness.
- Throw or attend a house party for the Ms. Foundation.
- Contact us to talk about new opportunities that match your interests.

The Ms. Foundation is grateful for gifts of cash, bonds, securities and in-kind contributions. For more information about how to make the greatest impact with your gift, please contact our Development staff at (212) 709-4452. Or, visit the Ways to Give section of our website at ms.foundation.org for additional information and to make a gift online.

PARTNERS IN PHILANTHROPY

The Ms. Foundation for Women is able to advance its efforts thanks to our donor partners. We would like to extend our heartfelt gratitude to the following individuals, foundations and corporations for their generous commitment to our vision of a just and safe world for women and girls.

WOMEN MOVING MILLIONS

We are grateful to our generous friends and donors who joined the Women Moving Millions campaign in support of the Ms. Foundation for Women. Launched in partnership with the Women's Funding Network and philanthropists Helen LaKelly Hunt and Swanee Hunt, Women Moving Millions is making history in philanthropy by women and for women by raising gifts of a million dollars and above. The campaign seeks to invest resources in a social justice agenda and provide substantial financial resources for women-led programs benefiting communities all over the globe.

The following women supported their sisters through their philanthropy by making cash and planned gifts to the Ms. Foundation for Women between November 2007 and April 2009 as part of this groundbreaking campaign:

Jennifer Buffett

Tracy Gary

Jane Comer

Lynne P. Rosenthal

Anne Delaney

E. Bonnie Schaefer

Barbara Dobkin

Jacki Zehner

These generous women join our growing list of donors whose gifts of a million dollars and above established the Endowment of the Ms. Foundation for Women in 2003, and whose vision and values are enabling the Ms. Foundation to build women's collective power to advance social change.

CREATING CONNECTIONS FOR POWERFUL, INCLUSIVE CHANGE IS AT THE HEART OF THE
MS. FOUNDATION FOR WOMEN'S APPROACH.
